THE ENGLISH FRANCHISE BILL PASSED BY THE LORDS. As the English House of Lords have passed the franchise bill, giving the voting privilege to between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000 persons who have not hitherto possessed it the manner in which the seats in the House of Commons will be distributed becomes the next subject of English legislative reform. That country does not distribute membership according to population, as we do, but an approach toward our system is proposed in the distribution bill introinced by Mr. Gladstone. It gives one member to cities, or in British language "boroughs," of 15,000 population, and larger boroughs in proportion. Smaller populations than 15,000 will be merged with counties in which they are situated. Up to this time a higher qualification was required in the counties to entitle to the voting power than in the boroughs. This distinction will now be done away, and residents in the country who never were voters before will henceforth hold that privilege. The lords and squires, and the great landholders generally, exercise more power over the country than over the town population, a fact that reconciles the Pories to the new legislative reform, as they expect the new system to secure them an increase of votes. This may tension of the voting power adds to the popular might against aristocratic domation, and when the people find it conferred in their own defense against oppression and in favor of Liberal princicreases, and in the end it will annihilate the prependerance of the aristocracy, and will destroy the hereditary system upon which the aristocratic and monarchial powers are based.

THE DISTRESS AND THE TREATIES The trade journals speak more cheer fully of the condition of business, an improvement partly owing to the approach of holidays, and which may vanish when that period has passed. Spite of these more favorable tidings, our telegraphic columns continue to give doleful accounts of bankruptcies, closing manufactories, diminished wages to the workingmen and Congress can at once do two encouraging things. It can put into effect the treaty with Mexico, which the Senate has ratified. It can ratify and put into operation the treaty our Minister has gained with Spain, which would open to us trade with Cuba and Porto Rico. Our manufacturers and merchants would begin to vie with each other to be the first to rush their products and stocks into the ports newly opened to their materials. To do this they must replenish their stocks and provide manufactured would have a vigorous effect at any me, but just now, when there is woe and very member of Congress, and especially every Senator should be urged to immeints of the country from Maine to Cali-
